(b) The essay is the most familiar of literary forms. Not only is the essay introduced to us from an early moment in the form of school compositions, but we discover it for ourselves in the course of letter writing. Because we desire to show vividly and concisely our experience, we have invented for ourselves the essay.

(c) "Don't other animals have their own languages?" one child asked.

This gave me the opportunity to outline some of the ways that language is special: how speech is far more rapid and precise than any other communication behavior, and how the underlying rules for constructing sentences are so complicated and curious that it's hard to explain how they could ever be learned.
